Senior Lecturer

Timothy is a Chartered Surveyor, a Chartered Builder and a corporate Building Engineer, specialising in teaching management issues concerning the construction and property industries and professions.

Qualifying as a quantity surveyor, Timothy worked in both public and private sector QS offices before moving to Kingston University. Using his work within both public housing and the privatisation programmes of the then Conservative government, he has spread his interests beyond construction and into various aspects of the surveying profession. For example, his recent publications examine the contested nature of valuation practice between surveyors and accountants.

Timothy is predominantly involved in teaching final year and postgraduate courses, specialising in those that examine the nature of business and the global context in which we all find ourselves. He also administers the School's research methodology and dissertation courses. His current research is on aspects of profession within building and property.
